Discrimination	Germany, Federal Anti-Discrimination Agency | Antidiskriminierungsstelle des Bundes	On discrimination of Muslims, empirical research in Germany is still underdeveloped; identifying it among other grounds (ethnicity, gender, poss. age and social status) is challenging. Predominately qualitative data suggest that Muslims face discrimination in employment primarily due to prejudices related to their ethnic origin. Some employers seem to expect negative customer reactions to Muslim staff; cases of gate keepers showing anti-Muslim resentments are described. Muslim women are affected by regulations and practices at the working place (i.e. re. scarf); legal exclusion or restrictions by clerical organisations are not yet sufficiently researched. The study provides recommendations for legislators and stakeholders for preventing discrimination in hiring and at the work place.	State of the art analysis of empirical research results and studies; identification of gaps in research on discrimination of Muslims in Germany. Qualitative document analysis.
