Introduction

The European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA) commissioned this report immediately after the violent anti-Roma incidents which took place in Italy in May of 2008. The purpose of the report is to provide the Community and its Member States with a factual overview of the situation during these months in Italy.

Whilst the main focus of this report is on the events relating to Roma, some information is also related to other minority groups. That is because measures taken by the Italian government in response to the events were simultaneously packaged with measures affecting irregular immigrants, and because the climate of public opinion generated by the Roma events also manifested itself in attacks on non-Roma immigrants.

The Agency collected the information on these events by drawing on its Racism and Xenophobia Network (RAXEN)² of National Focal Points (NFPs), of which there are 27, one in each Member State. The Italian NFP, COSPE³, was asked to document the facts of the violent incidents against the Roma population in Italy, the actions of the authorities, and the responses of the media and of civil society, as well as to provide other relevant contextual information to the FRA. The FRA National Liaison Officer for Italy⁴ also kindly provided additional input.

The time-line for this data-gathering exercise was from the beginning of May to the 20th June 2008, and the Italian NFP was asked to document incidents and responses which took place during this period. However, it should be noted that even in the short time between collecting data and the publication of this report, some things may have changed. For example, some of the policies announced by the Italian government during the reporting period may have been altered or withdrawn. On the other hand the proposal of the Italian authorities to fingerprint all Roma in Italy was made after the June 20 cut-off date. For that reason Section 8 covering this development has been included at the end of this report.

² Since 2000 the Agency collects data through its RAXEN National Focal Points (NFPs) in all EU Member States on issues of racism, xenophobia and related intolerances. NFPs are organisations selected by the Agency through an open call for tender and contracted to provide through different reporting tools background material on phenomena of racism, xenophobia and related intolerance, as well as policies and initiatives promoting equality and diversity; details at <http://www.fra.europa.eu> (01.08.2008).

⁴ Each EU Member State has nominated a government official as a National Liaison Officer (NLO) to the Agency to ensure close cooperation between the Agency and the Member States. NLOs are the main contact points for the Agency in the Member States. The Agency communicates to the National Liaison Officers all its reports and studies in order to promote the work of the Agency among relevant government departments and bodies.

1. Description of events

On the evening of May 10th 2008, a young Italian mother of a six-month old baby living on the Principe di Napoli Street in the suburban district of Ponticelli in the municipality of Naples, found a young girl – later identified as a 16-year old Roma living in one of the city's camps – in her apartment carrying her baby in her arms. She shouted at the girl and snatched her baby from her and the intruder tried to run away. On getting down the stairs, the woman's father who had heard her shouting for help engaged and caught the Roma girl and in a short time many of their neighbours converged on the scene. Only a timely intervention by the police saved the intruder from the crowd threatening to lynch her. Soon afterwards, she was charged with attempted kidnapping and unlawful intrusion into a private home and transferred to a nearby correctional centre for minors.⁵

The GIP (Giudice per le indagini preliminari) of the Tribunal for Minors later confirmed the arrest of the girl, held in the CPA⁶ in Nisida, after applying to her the restrictive measure of custodia cautelare (precautionary detention). The magistrate confirmed the charges. According to the media, the Roma girl involved had left a community based in Monte Procida where she had been staying since 26 April after having been arrested for stealing.⁷

There was an immediate backlash against the Roma in Ponticelli, and law enforcement agents started patrolling the area to discourage attacks against Roma camps. Three hours after the supposed kidnap attempt, about 20 Italian residents of Ponticelli attacked a Romanian labourer returning home from work; he was beaten and stabbed in one shoulder. Fearing possible attacks against them, the Roma on their part organised themselves to keep watch over their shacks and alert the residents in case of an attack.⁸ On the afternoon of May 12th, three Italian boys set the entrance to a Roma camp in the district on fire after pouring petrol around it. Meanwhile small groups of Roma who lived in isolated shacks in the district started abandoning their homes and during the night between 12th and 13th May, unknown persons set a number of these isolated shacks on fire.⁹ In the days following the supposed kidnap attempt, numerous attacks were carried out against the Roma.

On the afternoon of May 13th, a group of about 300 to 400 locals led by women launched an assault against one of the biggest Roma camps in the district, home to 48 Roma families. Using wooden and metal clubs, the attackers succeeded in pulling down the metal fence. Once inside the camp, they shouted insults and threats, threw stones against shacks and caravans, and overturned some cars. At about the same time an abandoned building which until two days before had been used by six Roma families was set on fire. In two separate incidents on the same day, two Roma boys were beaten by a gang of local boys and a small pickup owned by a Roma person was set on fire.¹⁰ Two Roma women were harassed and driven out of a supermarket close to one of the big camps while they were shopping.¹¹

On the same day, law enforcement agents decided to evacuate smaller camps and concentrate the former residents in a bigger camp with a police cordon around it, in order to protect them better. During the night of the 13th and 14th May, another camp in the district was evacuated and the 60 persons living in it were moved to a school on the opposite side of the city. Others left their shacks in small groups of two to three families to look for hospitality in camps in other districts of the city, or to join relatives outside the city. On May 14th, two other abandoned clusters of shacks were set ablaze with petrol and incendiary bottles. In a short time, the shacks were burnt down before a cheering crowd of locals, who also showed their disapproval of the fire services' attempts to put off the fire. As the few remaining Roma left the place under police escort, the crowd chanted: 'we have won', 'away, away'; 'you should all go away'.¹³

A third attack against another abandoned Roma camp by a group of local youngsters on motorbikes was partially foiled by rainfall, while the police managed to stave off the attackers at a fourth site.¹⁴ By the end of the 15th May, all Roma residents had been forced to leave the Ponticelli camps to go to camps and a school in other districts. On the same day, images of the burning camps and frightened faces of Roma children on pickups watching their former homes in flames made the headlines on television and in newspapers.

Some local administrators claimed that organised crime (the Camorra) may have been behind the attacks.¹⁵ Other NGO observers, who helped the Roma organise their transfers and maintained contacts with police and municipal authorities, agree that organised crime may well have been involved, but insisted that there had been an orchestrated effort by other actors who have economic interests in the area. In support of their claims, they point to the fact that the area where the camps were located fell under the Urban Rehabilitation Programme (PRU) approved by the municipal council with a pre-financing amount of 67 million euros and the condition that work would have to start on the programme before and no later than the 4th August, otherwise the pre-financing would be withdrawn. They argued that the Prefecture of Naples had already planned to evacuate the camps and to demolish the shacks so that construction work could start in the designated PRU area.¹⁶

The Under-Secretary of State for the Interior in a statement¹⁷ addressing the Parliament on the 29th May unreservedly condemned the violence and intolerance against the Roma and reaffirmed the government's will to act firmly to remove the causes at the root of these manifestations of intolerance. He also stated that according to a report of the investigative branch of the Naples police department (DIGOS) forwarded to the judicial authority there was no evidence at that time of "Camorra" criminality in the organisation or management of the attackers, without ruling out the possibility that local criminal elements may have used the situation to secure their presence on the territory.

2. Background information

The District of Ponticelli, officially called District n.6 of the municipality of Naples, is located on the eastern part of the city and has a resident population of 117,641, which comprises people who live permanently in the same municipality. It covers an area of about 19.28 square km, with a population density of 6,102 inhabitants per square km, one of the lowest of the ten districts in which the municipality of Naples is divided (the municipal average is 8,566 inhabitants / square km).¹⁸ These figures do not include Roma groups living in shacks in the district and mostly affected by the outbreak of anti-Roma violence in the area, mainly because most, if not all, of them are not registered in the municipal registry of residents. According to the local branch of Opera Nomadi, a major national organisation working with Roma groups, the number of Romanian Roma in the eastern district of Naples is about 400 to 500 people and about 1,000 in the entire municipality, out of about 1,500 to 1,600 Roma from the Balkans living in the municipality altogether.

According to information provided by the FRA's National Liaison Officer for Italy the province hosts around 5,400 Roma from both the former Yugoslavia, who arrived during the 1980s, and Romania, who settled after 2002. Unauthorised Roma camps are located in the Neapolitan districts of Ponticelli, Scampia, Poggioreale and Pianura with around 2,000 residents. The district of Ponticelli has seven unauthorised camps, with a total of 600 Romanian Roma. The municipalities of Giuliano, Caivano, Torre Annunziata, Acerra, Nola, San Giorgio, Casoria, Torre del Greco, Afragola-Casalnuovo also host large Roma settlements. According to the NLO, the relationship between Roma and local residents progressively worsened due to an increase in criminal activity and deteriorating public hygiene.

The great majority of Roma groups in Italy live in either 'authorised' or 'unauthorised' camps and this is particularly true for those from Romania who entered Italy after the visa requirement was removed in 2000 for Central and Eastern European countries and in 2002 for Bulgaria and Romania. The municipality of Naples has only one authorised camp.¹⁹ Inside these camps, often located close to motorways or railways or close to factories and far away from city centres, Roma families live in caravans and shacks, often without access to drinkable water or electricity, gas for cooking or heating, access roads or drainage systems. The situation in unauthorised camps is worsened by frequent forced evictions of the residents and destruction of their shacks in response to protests by inhabitants of the districts where such camps are located. Forced evictions are often accompanied by the expulsion of camp residents who do not have a legal title to stay in the country.

The policy of offering camps to Roma populations as places of residence stems from the belief that they were nomads and as such, frequently on the move from one territory to another. This belief is in contrast with the needs and preferences expressed by most Roma when consulted on the subject. A recent survey found that 75 per cent of the interviewees had been living in their current place of residence for, at least, the last four years and the average duration of residence in a camp was roughly 7.5 years.²⁰ Even so, the policy of setting up camps for them by local authorities continues. In most cases, people evicted from unauthorised camps either take refuge under highways, where they may end up building a number of shacks gradually transforming them into another unauthorised camp or, find temporary shelter with relatives in unaffected camps. A small group of those forced out of the Ponticelli district in May 2008 were re-located to an abandoned school, while the rest were escorted by law enforcement agents to nearby camps outside the district.

The health conditions in Roma camps are very poor. Often they are located close to waste dumps or, in some cases, directly on former dump sites. In most cities, access to health services by the Roma is provided by civil society and voluntary organisations. In education, similar problems as in the health sector are encountered: limited access to public educational services and the voluntary sector taking the lead in trying to meet the educational needs of children living in various camps in the district.

The district of Ponticelli has a lower employment rate (22.99 per cent) and a higher unemployment rate (39.95 per cent) than the municipal average (29.28 per cent and 31.39 per cent respectively), but these figures do not include Roma. The Soleterre/Axis Market Research survey found that 61 per cent of Roma were employed and only 2 per cent turned to begging²¹. The traditional trades of Italian Roma – such as collecting metal for re-cycling or horse rearing – have long fallen into crisis, except for amusement parks run mostly by Sinti groups. Roma groups from the Balkan region face even more difficulties finding employment.

Hostility against the Roma

Hostility against Roma populations is not a recent phenomenon in Italy and it is not limited only to the Ponticelli area. In this neighbourhood, as in many other areas where Roma camps are located, relationships with non-Roma populations are often difficult and tense. In the days following the events in Ponticelli, inhabitants of the neighbourhood declared that thefts and other petty crimes had increased social tensions and, for this reason, the Roma should be forced out of the district. Compositions written by pupils attending schools in Ponticelli reflected strong stereotypes against Roma as well as hostility and concerns about their presence in the neighbourhood.²²

There is no evidence of any significant steps taken by local authorities to prevent problems related to the camps. Unauthorised Roma camps were 'tolerated' by local authorities and there is no evidence of any attempts to improve living conditions in both authorised and unauthorised camps in Naples in the period before the events.

In the previous months and years, some similar events had occurred in Naples and in other areas of Italy. Only a month before the violent attacks in Ponticelli, in Giugliano, a small town near Naples, two boys had temporarily run away from home. Rumour quickly spread around to the effect that they had been kidnapped by Roma. Two men organised a punitive expedition against Roma residents of a nearby camp. Police intervened in time and stopped them and shortly afterwards the two boys were found playing in an amusement park.²³ In 2005, in another small village near Naples (Ercolano), a group of young boys attacked a Roma camp, poured petrol into some shacks, and tried to set them ablaze. All inhabitants of the camp were rescued and the attackers were promptly arrested.²⁴

At the national level, during the last year several cases of crimes committed by either Roma or Romanian citizens had stirred waves of xenophobia, by civil society, media and politicians. The most serious episodes were the murder of an Italian woman by a Romanian Roma in Rome in November 2007, and the death of an Italian girl injured in the underground in Rome by a young Romanian girl.²⁵ A year before there was a car accident caused by a drunken Roma boy that caused the death of three boys and a girl.²⁶ All these cases had given rise to bitter controversies on the presence of Roma in Italy and a wave of anti-Roma reactions, including the burning of the camp where the drunk driver used to live, after the inhabitants had evacuated it within two hours of the incident.

It is worth noting that in some cases, the mere presence of a camp in an area can spark off violent attacks against Roma. On 21st December 2006, a protest march against a Roma camp near Milan ended up with the camp being set on fire. Among the 15 people charged over the episode, two were municipal councillors.²⁷ In the night between 19th and 20th September 2007, about 40 people wearing masks and armed with Molotov cocktails, stones and chains tried to attack a Roma camp in Rome. The only person arrested for this arson attack claimed to be a member of a spontaneous committee of citizens protesting against the presence of the Roma in the neighbourhood.²⁸

3. Impact of the events

The Italian legal system provides a framework of guarantees protecting the fundamental rights of individuals fully and extensively and based on the principle of non-discrimination enshrined in the country's Constitution. Legislative Decree n. 215 of 9 July 2003 transposed the EU Racial Equality Directive 2000/43 providing legal protection against discrimination on grounds of race or ethnic origin in addition to existing legislation. The Italian Equality Body, the National Office against Racial Discrimination UNAR²⁹ (Ufficio Nazionale Antidiscriminazioni Razziali) was set up since November 2004 with the task to combat and record discrimination, and to assist victims in legal and administrative procedures. UNAR operates a multilingual toll free number 800.90.10.10 recording complaints and providing victim support. During 2007 it received approximately 8.000 phone calls, including cases of discrimination for which proceedings were instituted. However, UNAR could provide no information on the impact of the Ponticelli events to COSPE, the Italian RAXEN National Focal Point.

3.1. Legislative responses

Prior to the events in Ponticelli, the government had announced its intention to address criminality through a comprehensive 'security package' that included measures facilitating the deportation of irregular immigrants and criminalising the unauthorised entry into the country. The government further announced its intention to use the armed forces in law enforcement activities in cities, regulate the entry of Roma and Romanians by temporarily suspending the Schengen Agreement, and dismantle all unauthorised Roma camps deporting their residents.³⁰ On the 23rd of July 2008 the Italian Senate approved the security package decree transforming it into law.³¹

Following the events in Ponticelli, the political debate on the security package proposed by the government intensified, and proposed legislative measures were broadened in content, leading the government to split them into four distinct legislative instruments: a bill, a decree and three legislative decrees approved by the Council of Ministers during its meeting held in Naples on May 21st. The decree,³² which by its nature went into force following approval by the Council of Ministers and publication in the Official Gazette, provides that the expulsion of an irregular immigrant, both from the EU and non-EU, can be on the orders of a Giudice di Pace (Peace Judge). Failure to leave the country following an expulsion order issued by the judge will carry a jail term of one to four years; renting a house to an irregular immigrant, according to the decree, will lead to confiscation of the apartment and a jail term of up to three years.

³² Italy/ Decree Law n. 92 (23.05.2008). This type of Decree is a 'necessary and urgent measure' approved by the Government and it goes into force immediately after approval and publication and remain in force for a maximum of 60 days within which it has to be converted into law or it ceases to be in force.

The decree also introduces a new and general aggravating circumstance when a crime 'is committed by someone who is illegally on the territory of the state', which will apply also to EU citizens. For illegally resident immigrants found guilty of criminal offences, the penalties will be increased by a third. The decree also confers more powers on city mayors to prevent and eliminate dangers to public safety and urban security, as well as on municipal or administrative police, to intervene in cases of criminal offences in the act of being committed.

The new legislation criminalises unauthorised entry into the country (illegal immigration), punishable with a six-months to four-years prison term, and introduces fast track proceedings for immigration-related crimes. Detention of irregular immigrants in 'Identification and Expulsion Centres' is to be prolonged from the current maximum of 60 days to 18 months. The use of children in begging will become a crime punishable by imprisonment for up to three years and loss of parental powers or authority.³³ It also provides that registration in the municipal registry of residents will be on condition that the apartment or house meets a given health standard, a condition not applicable to Italian and EU citizens.

On May 14th, the Mayor of the city of Milan announced the appointment of the Prefect of the city as Extraordinary Commissioner for the 'Roma emergency'.³⁴ Following this development, the Minister of the Interior appointed Extraordinary Commissioners in Lazio (Rome), Lombardy (Milan) and Campania (Naples) and on May 26th, the relevant decree was published in the Official Gazette.³⁵ The mandate of these Commissioners is to coordinate the monitoring, mapping, rehabilitation and evacuation, where necessary, of Roma camps, and setting up new ones.

The 21st May Council of Ministers in Naples declared a state of emergency till May 31st in the Campania, Lazio and Lombardia Regions. Furthermore, the Prefects of Naples, Rome and Milan were entrusted with special powers to deal with the state of emergency, in cooperation with mayors, local authorities and NGOs. The Naples Prefect highlighted the need to speed up decision making on issues regarding immigration, but also called for dialogue with other institutions, authorities, representatives of the Roma communities and civil society. The Prefect proposed a package of measures, which included a Roma census, improvements to regular settlements, gradual phasing out of illegal camps, reallocation of Roma in small groups across the region, and promotion of integration and of social inclusion projects.

On May 26th, the Minister of the Interior announced his intention to start mapping Roma camps and take a census of the residents.³⁶ The first such exercise took place in the outskirts of Milan on the 6th June, when about 70 law enforcement agents (State and Municipal Police and Carabinieri) moved into an authorised camp and searched all the homes, and the 35 residents, all of them Italian Roma. However, the association Opera Nomadi, as well as opposition parties, NGOs and the trade union CGIL criticised this initiative.³⁷

During a meeting at the Prefecture of Milan on June 17th, the Minister of the Interior declared that Prefects would close down authorised camps that were not properly provided with such basic facilities, e.g. drinking water or electricity. Only Italian Roma and Sinti groups would be allowed to settle in authorised camps, while foreign Roma would be allowed to use transit camps for a period not exceeding three months.³⁸

3.2. Reactions to legislative responses

The National Association of Magistrates strongly criticised the provision criminalising unauthorised entry by immigrants because it would be almost impossible to manage and would have a negative impact on the entire judicial machinery.³⁹ The President of the Association of Criminal Law Practitioners defined the provision making irregular stay in the country an aggravating circumstance as ‘unlawful from an equality perspective’, because such a measure is connected to a subjective condition of the person.⁴⁰ Strong criticism of the same provision was also expressed by the National Association of Democratic Jurists.

Many civil society actors also criticised the security package. The national association ARCI declared that the package fuelled insecurity, lawlessness and fear. Two major Catholic organisations – Caritas and ACLI – pointed out that linking crime to immigration only generates confusion.⁴¹

The Romanian Prime Minister expressed concern about the proposed package and anti-Romanian measures that would mostly damage honest and hard working Romanians living in Italy.⁴² After the package had been approved, the Romanian Under-Secretary at the ministry of External Affairs declared that the provisions seemed to respect EU norms, but that it would be necessary to monitor how they would be applied.

3.3. Other incidents against Roma

In many cities, there were cases of verbal and physical aggression against Roma and Romanians. In Milan, Genoa, Viareggio, Trento, Asti and Bologna groups of citizens protested against the presence of Roma camps in their neighbourhoods.⁴³ In Pisa, a Roma youth was attacked and beaten for no apparent reason.⁴⁴

In Milan, an incendiary bottle was thrown into an abandoned shop used by two Roma boys as a sleeping place.⁴⁵ In May a Romanian boy was beaten and insulted by four Italian boys. The aggressors shouted insults at him saying: 'stinking and disgusting Romanian, go away from Italy'.⁴⁶ At a maternity ward in a hospital in Pisa, some women refused to share a room with a Roma woman in labour and the nurses had to find a separate place for her.⁴⁷ A 16-year old Roma girl in her sixth month of pregnancy was insulted and beaten, while she was begging along the beach in Rimini, by a man who hit her on the back. Fortunately, the incident did not affect her pregnancy. The incident was later made public by activists of the Roma support organisation Gruppo Everyone.⁴⁸

The Association *Sucar-Drom*⁴⁹ has reported a number of cases of intolerance and racist violence in various cities against Roma and Sinti groups. In Brescia, a little Roma girl was insulted at school and in Mantova the home of a Roma family was attacked. Another association, Gruppo Everyone, reported an act of aggression that took place on June 17th against a Roma girl and the beating of her father, a missionary of the Christian Evangelical Pentecostal Church, on June 20th in Milan, by two uniformed police agents.⁵⁰

In Novara, two unknown persons on a motorbike threw four incendiary bombs at a Roma camp causing damage to property. The police said the attack might have been related to a public controversy in the city over the transfer of the local Roma population to a new site.⁵¹

In some authorised camps around Rome, the residents organised voluntary night patrol groups to guard the camps soon after the attacks in the Ponticelli district of Naples.⁵²

Teachers at a middle school in the outskirts of Milan wrote a letter to the Minister of Education denouncing the climate of intimidation and violence against Roma pupils in their school. The teachers said that Roma pupils were targets of racist insults and threats by their non-Roma schoolmates and as a consequence, many of them had abandoned the school.⁵³

3.4. Incidents against non-Roma minorities

In the climate of xenophobia and racism that was generated during this period, non-Roma minorities were also caught up.

On May 14th, the chief conductor of a train was accused by a Ghanaian woman of abuse of power, violence, unlawful damage of property and physical assault. The chief conductor, according to the woman and witnesses who had been at the scene, had thrown her luggage off the train one stop before the one where she was supposed to get off, pushing and insulting her.⁵⁴ In Civitavecchia, a Senegalese citizen was attacked for no apparent reason by two women and one man. The police charged them with discrimination, injury, threat and racist insults.⁵⁵

A racist poster was circulated in different cities saying that 'the hunting season had been declared open' for the following 'migratory species – Albanians, Kosova, Talibans, Gypsies, non-EU citizens in general'. The authorities in the cities where this racist flier was distributed condemned it and announced their intention to lodge complaints with the judiciary.⁵⁶

An Albanian dancer and TV performer was attacked and beaten up inside his school by unknown persons shouting 'stinking Albanian, we'll send you back to Albania'.⁵⁷

On May 24th, in a neighbourhood of Rome with a high density of foreigners, a group of 15 to 20 people wearing masks and carrying clubs and metal bars attacked three shops owned by Indian and Bangladeshi immigrants. The attackers broke windows, goods and furniture inside the shops, injuring a client in one of the shops. The aggressors shouted 'Bastards, go away from here'. All political parties condemned the attack as xenophobic.⁵⁸ The following day, Italian and foreign residents of the area organised marches against racism.⁵⁹

In the small municipality of Altopascio in Lucca Province, the kebab shop of a Turkish citizen was badly damaged by five incendiary bottles thrown into it at night by unknown persons. After the initial investigations, police said the arson might have had a xenophobic motivation.⁶⁰

4. Responses to the events

4.1. Responses by public authorities

The police reacted swiftly to the Ponticelli incidents, deploying significant forces to protect Roma living in camps and guard their property. The Municipality and civil protection units were mobilised to provide support to affected Roma residents with the assistance of the “Opera Nomadi” organisation. Those living in the attacked settlements were moved to camps outside Naples or to the reception centre of “Santa Maria del Pianto” in the Poggioreale district.

The Carabinieri identified five residents of Ponticelli (four 15-year old boys and one 33-year old man) as perpetrators of one attack against a Roma camp and they were charged with stealing objects from the shacks, and setting the camp on fire.⁶¹

On May 16th the Councillor for Social Policies of the Campania Region organised a meeting with representatives of the Municipality of Naples, the Province of Naples, Sant’Egidio Community, Caritas and Opera Nomadi, to discuss issues related to the accommodation of Roma who had been forced out of their former camps. During the meeting, participants (local authorities and associations) decided to create a permanent consultative group that will define and implement further actions and initiatives. The Councillor allocated 400,000 euros to promote Roma social integration, and proposed to assign small areas belonging to the Region and other local authorities to Roma and Sinti. The Councillor also announced the establishment of a consultative group that will carry out social and cultural activities in order to defuse tensions and create a new climate of reconciliation.⁶²

The Romanian Embassy made available, since April 2008, a hotline for Romanian citizens to report situations of danger or extreme difficulties encountered in Italy. The Embassy emphasised that it would do all that it could, diplomatically and otherwise, to help anyone who may be facing discriminatory and/or xenophobic treatment.⁶³

4.2. Responses by civil society

On 15th May, hundreds of people took part in a demonstration in front of the Municipality of Naples, to express their solidarity with the Roma. Participants protested against racist acts and condemned the criminalisation of all Roma.⁶⁴ Speaking at this event, many associations working for the integration of the Roma in different parts of Italy argued that tackling the problems of camps as places of residence for the Roma was a viable way to reduce social tensions and improve living conditions of these minorities. In particular, they pointed out that in some local areas where Roma camps had been closed and apartments had been assigned to Roma families, tensions have been reduced and problems with other residents have been minimised.

On 17th May in Mantova, Italian and foreign Roma / Sinti associations and communities which are part of the first national federation formed in 2007, known as 'Roma and Sinti Together', met to define initiatives aimed at countering the xenophobic climate against them. They decided, among others, to start monitoring discrimination against Roma and Sinti groups, and invited all associations to cooperate in documenting cases encountered by members of their communities. The federation promoted meetings and public debates in May and June on the recent events affecting them, and on the security package adopted by the government.⁶⁵

A number of prominent people, and many other citizens, signed a petition and organised a demonstration to express their solidarity with the Sinti of Venice, who had been verbally attacked by the Northern League party in relation to a new village planned for them. The construction of the village for Sinti families by the Municipality of Venice had been blocked by some activists of the Northern League Party who had chained themselves to the gate of the construction site. The Mayor of Venice condemned this action but decided also to temporarily suspend work on the site in order to reduce tensions.⁶⁶

The Roma association *Them Romano*⁶⁷ organised a large demonstration in Rome on June 8th with the participation of Roma and Sinti against racism, xenophobia and discrimination. Many other associations working in defence of minorities' rights and anti-racism, including activists of some left wing political parties, took part in the demonstration.⁶⁸

On 17th June 2008, Rome based anti-racist and civil rights organisations held a public assembly titled 'A thousand voices against racism' at the University of Rome 'La Sapienza', in order to discuss recent manifestations of racism and the government's bill aimed at making irregular immigration a crime. The assembly took place with the support and participation of a large number of experts, researchers and politicians.⁶⁹

In June 2008, the National Council of the Association of Journalists and the Italian National Press Federation (FNSI), in cooperation with the UNHCR, adopted a document known as the 'Charter of Rome', which outlines professional ethics and standards that should be respected when writing about asylum seekers, refugees, victims of trafficking of human beings, and migrants.⁷⁰ The elaboration of the document had started in 2007 following a serious case of ethnic profiling as a result of which a migrant from North Africa had been accused by most of the media of having murdered his Italian wife, their two-year old son, the wife's mother and a neighbour. Within 24 hours, the police had found solid evidence that the migrant had been out of Italy at the time, and that the murder had been committed by an Italian couple living next door to the victims.

Following the events in Ponticelli, a group of journalists launched a petition expressing concern about the active role of the media in fomenting xenophobia against foreigners. The authors of the petition called on fellow journalists to respect the ethics of their profession and fight cases of discrimination and racism in the media.⁷¹

5. Domestic reactions

On the occasion of the celebrations for the Italian Republic (2nd June), in his message to the nation, the President of the Republic warned against intolerance and violence which he said were growing in the country, highlighting that they were the negation of the Constitutional principles.⁷²

However, the local branch of the Democratic Party which governs the Ponticelli District Council issued a statement circulated throughout the district, saying that ‘the continuous increase in Roma shanty settlements in different areas of the district has become unsustainable’ and that the ‘Municipality, the Prefecture, Public Security forces and the Local Health Services should finally respond to requests, so far ignored, for an immediate demolition of the camps and to restore serenity and security to Ponticelli citizens’.⁷³

The Catholic Church condemned the acts of violence against Roma, cautioning citizens of Naples not to act in a ‘thoughtless’ way, and the Pope highlighted the right of immigrants to family reunion.⁷⁴

On the other hand, activists of Forza Italia and National Alliance parties declared that the mayor of Naples should order the evacuation of all Roma camps because, ‘the time for half measures has run out’.⁷⁵ Also in other areas of the country, local centre-right parties requested that the Roma be expelled from cities.⁷⁶

The president of the Province of Milan (a member of the Democratic Party) said in interviews that in the metropolitan area of Milan⁷⁷ the number of Roma had become unsustainable and as a consequence, the objective was to close down all camps in the area. He also declared that ‘other repatriations are necessary; agreements with the countries of origin and the Romanian government should be signed, in order to stop them [the Roma] from leaving their countries. After that, expulsions should follow. In the metropolitan area there should not be even one Roma camp’.⁷⁸

On 16th May, the Minister of Foreign Affairs declared that it was necessary to reflect at a European level on the Schengen Agreement, which had made it easier to travel across borders between EU member states. The Minister stated that it was necessary to review the 22-year old agreement in order to verify if, in a profoundly changed Europe, some changes could be made.⁷⁹

The Minister for Reforms (leader of the Northern League Party), speaking about the episodes of aggression against Roma camps in Ponticelli, stated that ‘if the State fails to do its duty, people will then do it because after some time, people lose patience and react’.⁸⁰

A parliamentarian from the Forza Italia party declared that, in order to deal with the rubbish collection emergency in the Campania region, local authorities could use foreign citizens without regular permits to stay and reward them by granting residence permits. All political parties criticised this statement, including the Northern League.⁸¹

In an interview for the newspaper Il Tempo, the Undersecretary at the Ministry of Interior, talking about Roma, noted that: ‘Figures and sociological studies demonstrate that this ethnic group is associated to some types of crimes: thefts, robberies and, as in the case of Ponticelli, also kidnapping’.⁸²

6. International reactions

During the debate that took place in the European Parliament on the 20th of May regarding the Italian situation following events in Ponticelli, The Commissioner for Employment, Social Affairs & Equal Opportunities criticised the stigmatisation of Roma as criminals and asked all Member States to investigate and punish those who commit racist acts. The Commissioner also invited the government of Italy and the other Members States to tackle integration problems.⁸⁴

The MEP Viktoria Mohacsi, after her visit to some Roma camps in Rome and Naples, declared during a hearing before the Committee on Civil Liberties (LIBE) of the European Parliament that the situation of Roma in Italy was one of the worst in Europe. The MEP highlighted problems of illegality, lack of hygiene, services, or drinking water, and lack of security in the camps where the police carry out night raids for no reason.⁸⁵

Following these developments in Italy, at the end of June 2008 the Council of Europe Commissioner for Human Rights visited Rome to discuss the policies of the Italian government on migration and Roma people. The Commissioner stated that criminalising migrants will have negative effects and put stigma on innocent people. He also expressed his concerns about the climate of anti-Ziganism. "It is important that politicians guarantee fundamental rights to Roma people and discourage any tendency of discrimination and scapegoating", he said.⁸⁶

The OSCE expressed a deep concern for the violent attacks in Naples and urged the Italian authorities to assure the protection for Roma populations living on its territory.⁸⁷

The UN High Commissioner for Human Rights criticised new Italian laws against irregular immigration and the initiatives against Romanian Roma in her address on the occasion of the 8th Session of the Human Rights Council.⁸⁸

The European Network Against Racism (ENAR) strongly condemned the attacks in Ponticelli and expressed concern about political and media discourse on the Roma and

Romanian citizens in Italy and the new security measures that affect these groups.⁸⁹ The European Roma Rights Centre (ERRC) requested, in a letter to the Italian President of the Republic and the Prime Minister, an urgent intervention by Italian authorities to protect Roma from acts of racist violence following events in Ponticelli and 'to defuse the climate of anti-Romani hostility which is prevailing in Italy'.⁹⁰

Furthermore, on the occasion of the presentation of its 2008 report, the EU Office of Amnesty International expressed alarm about the Italian situation and accused the government of enacting laws aimed at making life difficult for Roma and immigrants in general.⁹¹ The ADL (Anti Defamation League) also called on the Italian government to "publicly condemn xenophobia against Roma".⁹²

7. Surveys and opinion polls

A survey conducted by IPR Marketing on behalf of the national daily *La Repubblica*⁹³ found that Italians had a negative opinion of immigrants and that their aversion against the Roma was even greater. 60 per cent of interviewees felt personally threatened by the presence of the Roma (47 per cent by the presence of non-EU citizens), while 68 per cent (57 per cent for non-EU citizens) were concerned about the Italian situation in general. 68 per cent thought that all Roma camps should be dismantled and Roma populations expelled from the country. The percentage of interviewees who had trust in policies of social integration of Roma was quite low (only 27 per cent). 52 per cent believed that non-EU citizens who live in Italy without working should be immediately repatriated.

The most negative feelings were against Roma: 41 per cent of the sample would have liked to send them out of Italy (10 per cent would like to send non-EU citizens out), 27 per cent were afraid of them (15 per cent are afraid of non-EU citizens), 24 per cent 'tolerated' them and did not have negative feelings towards them (45 per cent in the case of non-EU citizens).

According to a survey carried out by ISPO and published in the national newspaper Corriere della Sera,⁹⁴ Italian citizens welcomed the so-called 'security package'. 31 per cent of the sample knew 'well' the contents of the package and 37 per cent had heard about it. 86 per cent of people who voted for centre-right parties and 58 per cent of people who voted for centre-left parties agreed with security measures affecting Roma.

A weekly survey conducted by the research institute *Istituto Piepoli*⁹⁵ examined opinions on the seriousness of the racist incidents. 64 per cent of interviewees thought that the racist episode that had taken place on 24th May in a neighbourhood in Rome was a confirmation of widespread racism. Although one out of three Italians believed that it was an 'occasional' episode, 87 per cent were worried about recent racist events.

An opinion poll carried out by Demos in May 2008 highlighted a growing feeling of insecurity among Italian citizens.⁹⁶ 63 per cent of interviewees agreed with the presence of spontaneous vigilante groups in the neighbourhoods of the cities, and 44.5 per cent felt threatened by the presence of immigrants (+1.3 per cent compared to April 2007). About 31 per cent of the sample thought that shanty towns, Roma camps and neighbourhoods significantly inhabited by immigrants should be evacuated or prohibited, 46.6 per cent believed that evacuation should be done only after having identified new accommodation, while 19.2 per cent thought that in these areas, checks by police forces should be intensified.

8. The Roma ‘census’

On 25 June 2008 the Italian government announced its intention to carry out a census and fingerprint all Roma and Sinti, including children, in the three regions where extraordinary commissioners had been appointed to manage the ‘Roma emergency’. This attracted strong criticism from members of the Catholic Church, opposition parties and civil society both within and outside Italy.

According to the Interior Minister the planned ‘census’ of Roma and Sinti was not ‘ethnic profiling’, but aimed at ensuring decent living conditions for all those who had a legal entitlement to reside in Italy, while those who were there illegally would be expelled. Identifying minors would allow authorities to involve them in projects aiming at ensuring school attendance that would facilitate integration, while the census would also serve to identify persons who committed criminal acts, as well as irregular immigrants. The proposal drew strong critical reactions from civil society, Roma activists and members of the Catholic Church. For example, the Secretary of the Pontifical Council for Migrants and Travellers and Titular Archbishop of Astigi condemned the initiative arguing: ‘We cannot make poverty a crime’. The Comboni Missionary Sisters described the planned fingerprinting of Roma and Sinti children as ‘racist’, saying: ‘It is incomprehensible why at such a tender age they should already be made to feel different – the bearers of a modern-day yellow Star of David that brands them as probable future criminals.’⁹⁷

The government’s announcement also prompted strong reaction from the European Commission in the form of a letter to the Italian government requesting that the government specify the purposes for which fingerprints are collected and processed, the legal basis for doing so, how they are stored and for how long, whether there is written information to individuals prior to the collection of the fingerprints, and to confirm that in the case of minors under 14 years of age, fingerprints are taken only when specifically authorised by a judge and for the purpose of establishing their identity.⁹⁸

On the 10th July 2008 the European Parliament, in its resolution⁹⁹ on the census of the Roma on the basis of ethnicity in Italy, and noting that the Italian Data Protection Authority has expressed concern that it could entail discrimination that might also affect personal dignity, notably that of minors, urged the Italian authorities to refrain from collecting fingerprints from Roma, including minors, and from using fingerprints already collected, pending the forthcoming announced evaluation by the Commission of the measures envisaged, as this would clearly constitute an act of direct discrimination based on race and ethnic origin prohibited by Article 14 of the ECHR and furthermore an act of discrimination between EU citizens of Roma origin and other citizens, who are not required to undergo such procedures.

Furthermore, the European Parliament shared the view of the Commission that such acts would constitute a violation of the prohibition on direct and indirect discrimination, particularly as laid down in Council Directive 2000/43/EC and enshrined in Articles 12, 13 and 17 to 22 of the EC Treaty and called on the Commission to thoroughly evaluate the legislative and executive measures adopted by the Italian Government in order to check their compatibility with the Treaties and with EU law. Finally, the European Parliament expressed its concern at the affirmation - contained in the administrative decrees and orders issued by the Italian Government - that the presence of Roma camps around large cities in itself constitutes a serious social emergency with repercussions for public order and security which justify declaring a state of emergency for one year.

9. Conclusions

The aim of this report has been to bring together the basic facts on the anti-Roma events which occurred in Italy during May – June 2008. It gives a summary of the incidents of aggression against Roma and their camps, provides a brief background context to the events, and then describes the responses of the Italian authorities in the form of legal measures. The report illustrates the climate of intolerance generated by the events in Ponticelli and the generally negative subsequent political discourse. The report also presents examples of the critical reactions of civil society and international bodies to the events and to the responses of the Italian authorities.

The events which have occurred in Italy serve as a reflection of the wider problems faced by Roma communities all over Europe. Despite measures and policies promoting Roma integration and inclusion by Member States throughout the EU and at EU level by the European Commission and despite efforts of the Council of Europe and of other international organisations, progress in implementing them is slow. As previous reports by the Agency have repeatedly pointed out Roma, Sinti and Traveller groups are the most vulnerable groups in Europe, suffering problems such as poor and segregated housing conditions, discrimination and forced evictions in more than half of the Member States of the EU.¹⁰⁰ Systematic discrimination against Roma also exists in access to employment, and in the fields of health and education. However, even without this extra burden of discrimination, the appalling housing conditions of the Roma make it difficult to make progress in these other spheres of social life.¹⁰¹

It is significant that so many of the Roma camps in the areas where the incidents in Italy took place were unauthorised camps. It is therefore important, as an emergency measure, that in all Member States, unauthorised camps are replaced as soon as possible with authorised sites equipped with adequate hygienic facilities providing water, sanitation, electricity and access to public transport. Yet all over the EU there are cases where local authorities fail to assist Roma groups in improving their accommodation. As the Council of Europe Commissioner for Human Rights stated, 'The non-integration and the hostilities with which the Roma are faced in many European States nowadays

The events in Ponticelli show that protecting fundamental rights in the European Union requires that governments comply with the duty to respect, protect and promote fundamental rights not only by providing the necessary legal safeguards, but also by ensuring that these are applied effectively in practice by public authorities at national, regional and local level.

The Racial Equality Directive 2000/43/EC of 29 June 2000 provides protection against discrimination, but clearly the situation of many Roma and Traveller groups throughout the European Union requires more than that; achieving equal treatment requires strong political commitment and urgent action on the ground in the context of a holistic approach developing long term strategies, policies and measures for all areas of social life.

The FRA recognises that a longer period of information gathering is necessary in order to monitor further developments in this area in Italy and across the European Union. The Agency will continue to collect data and information in relation to the circumstances of Roma, Sinti and Traveller communities across the EU, and will publish them in future reports.
